- Ruth Kirk in her book 'Wisdom of The Elders/Native Traditions on the Northwest Coast' (1986) very sensibly poses the question 'How old is Northwest Coast Art?' This is a pertinent question when discussing carved ivory from this geographical area; see for instance, Sotheby's New York/4-12-1997 (lot 380) for another armless figure attributed to the Old Bering Sea culture, circa 100-300AD. What is certain, however, is that the art tradition from this vast, Arctic triangle which comprises St Lawrence Island and the Bering Sea to Ellesmere Island and British Columbia may be far more ancient than we yet imagine. Certainly, 14,000 or so years ago, when the Bering Straits are thought to have been crossed, there were some who travelled eastwards towards Ellesmere Island, and some who travelled south towards British Columbia.
- Presumably, for this reason, there may be some correlation between anthropomorphic forms found in both Alaska and British Columbia. Compare also for example, the Welcome Figure in cedar wood, dated to circa 1900, from the Kwakwaka Wakw People in British Columbia (now in the Denver Art Museum, Colorado). Of course, as the late 14th Century dating of Yttygran Island's whalebone structures implies, there were obviously some Siberian or Alaskan Peoples who either did not cross the Bering Strait, or who perhaps crossed it repeatedly backwards and forwards. Whatever the case, the significance of whalebone as a form of art, design or devotion is notable on both sides of the Bering Strait.
